

Assessment of dementia and cognitive changes

One in seven people over the age of 70 experiences dementia and another 22% demonstrate symptoms of cognitive decline that falls short of dementia. Those who escape the symptoms of dementia may spend a substantial portion of retirement years caring for a friend or family member with cognitive impairment. The rise of the baby boomer generation is expected bring unprecedented rates of cognitive syndromes like Alzheimer's disease, yet most mental health professionals have formal training to work with this vulnerable population. This workshop provides a clinical approach to understanding and assessing these syndromes.
