

Fight, flight, freeze and fawn: What social service providers need to know about trauma responses

Given the amount of trauma individuals have experienced, it's crucial for social service providers to understand common trauma responses and how they may manifest. Although fight, flight, and freeze are more commonly known there is more acknowledgment of the fawn response. This training will provide an overview of these common trauma responses, how they manifest and how to clients. Not only is it important for us to understand these trauma responses it's equally as important to help clients understand how they show up in their lives and may even be impeding their functioning at home, at school and other settings.
